Preparation:
Since my Erasmus was virtual and online only from my home university in Germany, there was little to do beforehand. The application process at my home university was daunting but the staff were very helpful and answered questions by video call also. After the video call, I felt confident about the process so I wish I had the 1-1 conversation much earlier, rather than near to the application deadline.

University:
At the university, there was a virtual introduction event for Erasmus participants 5 days before my courses started. Everyone had an opportunity to introduce themselves and almost all participants in the Teams call switched on their camera to introduce themselves. The introduction was helpful to understand the university online portals using the credentials that we had received. Since not all courses had complete information from the Professors, there were

Some issues in enrolling into desired courses the weekend before they were to begin. Also, the course information page had outdated information, such as old codes for joining the Teams lectures. This was not a problem for me as the Professor had made access to the Teams group moments before the first lecture, but, during the first two lectures they mentioned that others had issues to join, so the first few lectures included waiting technical issues to be solved. Unfortunately, the virtual introduction meeting did not have breakout groups or introduction games, which was a common issue for all courses that I participated.

The virtual meetings and lectures were conducted on Teams and the materials were all uploaded there after each class concluded. Most lectures started between 15-30 minutes after the scheduled start time. Since it was a regular occurrence the start and end times felt often casual but near the end of the course some extra hours were added to complete the content. The university including the professors and staff were helpful and responsive to issues either by virtual class or by email. There was no attendance recorded and some professors established a system whereby the students have a choice to be attending or non-attending. For one course I was an attending student, which meant I participated in the live lectures and formed a team for group work. For the other course I was a non-attending student, which meant that I would watch the recorded lectures and instead of participating in group work, I chose to answer more questions in the written exam. The non-attending option was nice due to the flexibility, I could attend another course that had a conflict in schedule. Another good flexible option was that there were 3 or 4 dates available to students to register for exam dates. The registration end date for these different exam dates were also 4 days before the exam took place and allowed me to assess nearer the actual exam date how ready I was to complete the exam. One exam was oral, which was rather difficult as I did not spend much time talking about the content during the lectures (i.e., no breakout rooms) or outside of the lecture times. The professor did encourage more verbal communication, but it is not easy when lacking confidence or bravery. Another exam was a written test, and the professor scheduled a video call for the exam, but it is started 40 minutes after the scheduled time. There was some indication during the wait that things were not going to plan but it was frustrating.

Conclusion:
The flexibility of the courses was a positive highlight. Both the option to re-watch lectures and to choose an exam date very close to the performance was ideal. A negative experience was that during a course, students were tasked with forming a team for group work and this was difficult to do without the aid of the professor. After I had formed a team, my colleagues had dropped out of the course and the work was too much to do individually near to the deadline.
